

APRIL 29 COFFEEHOUSE TO OFFER A SLICE OF Sour Cherry Pie (PHIL HART & STEVE ROLFE)

Interview by Bill Cohen

Phil Hart, singer/songwriter, folk musician, and his bass playing buddy, Steve Rolfe play songs with catchy tunes with thought-provoking lyrics that Phil has been writing since the early 70s.

Bill Cohen: At our monthly coffeehouses, we define “folk music” very broadly, so each of our featured acts have differed greatly. For folks who’ve never heard you sing, please tell us how you describe your music.

Phil Hart: I have always struggled with the “genre” label. In the 70s I was in a band called “Succotash”, which we understood to be a pot of corn, several kinds of beans, and any other vegetables you happened to have in the fridge. It was a nod to the fact that our

2 Fun Musical Ways You Can Help This Year’s Folk Festival !

Pay a few bucks to hear some great folk music . . . and help us pay for this year’s Central Ohio Folk Festival. That’s the idea behind two upcoming musical fundraisers.

April 8 will feature a double shot – two polished bands will take the stage in the party room at El Vaquero Mexican Restaurant at 3230 Olentangy River Road. Whiskey Maggie calls itself “an set list included all kinds of stuff, from Peter, Paul, and Mary to the Beatles to Dolly Parton to the Everly Brothers to some of our originals. The music I am drawn to and try to write should have a melody that can stand on its own and some lyrical poetry to make me want to pay attention.

Bill: Many of your songs are originals. Tell us a little about how you do your writing. Where do your ideas come from? Give us an example of one of your originals and how it came to be.

Phil: Song ideas usually come to me in one of two ways. One is fear of the deadline, like where I promised someone I was going to write a song for their wedding or something. But the most common place for me to encounter my muse is on the interstate. When I am out on the highway my consciousness goes into some kind of musical Zen state, and it is difficult to keep my brain from throwing out little phrases and saying, “Hey, what do you think about this?”

My song, “Visiting Nanna,” showed up on the way to Wisconsin two years ago for the holidays. It’s about my sister-in-law narrated by her young granddaughter. We were crossing northern Illinois when I turned to my wife and said, “Hey, write this down.” I continued to dictate phrase by phrase till, in less than an hour, there it was. That was unusually fast, but typical of how the core of a song shows up.

Bill: Who are the musician heroes and heroines that have influenced your music?

Phil: Tom Paxton was a huge influence on me when I was young, though I didn’t realize it at the time, because when I was learning his songs, it was through someone else’s voice. I loved Bob Dylan and Phil Ochs for their social justice voice and James Taylor for his style. I was a huge Crosby, Stills, Nash, and Young fan. I was introduced to John Prine late. He’s a hero.

Bill: What’s your history as a performer and song writer? When and how did your musical career begin?

Phil: When I was in junior high an older cousin lent me two Brothers

Four albums and one of Kingston Trio’s. That was a pivotal moment in my life. In 1967 I enrolled as a vocal music major at a big state school where I had to hide my folk tendencies from my professors. Then while working at a summer camp in 1970, another counselor introduced me to the idea that it was okay to write our own songs. I had just started playing the guitar the winter before, encouraged by another friend. Two of those first songs, the “Friend Song” and “Shine,” came directly out of the Camp Akita experience, and I still get requests to perform them. In retrospect it may seem odd to some folks, but I never really saw myself as a songwriter till I turned 50 and my wife insisted that my birthday present was to be a recording session with several old friends from California. That turned into the album Sing Me Home and inspired the title track.

Bill: Do any of your past performances come to mind as being particularly great...or awful ?

Phil: I think what sticks out right now is the recent overwhelmingly positive reaction I have been getting from folks to my song “Lady Liberty,” which was written in the fall of 2010. It is surprising and sad that the theme in that song is even more of a crisis today than when I first wrote it.

Bill: At your April coffeehouse appearance, you'll have some excellent back-up musicians, and you'll actually be appearing as part of a group called Sour Cherry Pie. Tell us about your fellow music-makers.

Phil: In about 2010, I was invited to sing several songs for a wedding, and I asked the couple if they would mind if I got some guys to help me. Steve Rolfe (bass) and Perry Leatherman (mandolin and vocals) put together a nice little set of songs, and when the wedding was over we had lots of nice feedback including a couple of folks who wanted to know what the name of our band was. Sour Cherry Pie was born out of that gig, and we played around Columbus till the summer of 2013 when the Rainbow Gardens album was recorded, Perry moved to Morgantown, and Steve headed to China to teach English for two years. And I thought I was just getting warmed up! I was relieved when Steve came home, and we got back to playing and decided to keep the Sour Cherry Pie label as a way to keep folks connected with our performance calendar. I really appreciate the flavors, rhythmic and melodic, that Steve adds to our sets. (You can check our Facebook page for upcoming performances.)

Bill: Is there a particular theme or thrust that seems to run through many of your songs?

Phil: I don't know that there is a theme, per se. I intentionally try to mix the musical style of my songs, but lyrically I am most attracted to telling stories that come from actual relationship experiences. In the last few years I have joked that I am currently more in my “Phil Ochs” period in trying to use my songs as lenses for looking at religious or political positions in a different light.

energetic and entertaining pseudo-traditional Irish lineup.” The foursome includes guitar, fiddle, flute, and bodhran/cajon. As the band’s website notes: “These guys are all about drinking, joking, and singing along (often in that order). Whiskey Maggie will pump out some rowdy pub songs paired unceremoniously with foot-stomping traditional tunes.”

Also in the musical lineup will be longtime CFMS favorites, Halfway Home. That 5 member band specializes in Americana music, which often tells poignant stories about the gritty lives of prisoners, factory workers, diner waitresses, gamblers, addicts, lovers, and down-and-outers.

For a $10 per person donation at the door, you’ll be able to experience both those great bands and help produce the folk festival on May 6 and 7. The evening at the April 8 fundraiser starts at 6:30 p.m. If the music makes you hungry, you can buy delicious Mexican food off the El Vaquero menu. Plus, there’s a bar.

The mood, food, and playlist will be different at an April 23 musical fundraiser. CFMS JAMMERS SPREAD FOLK MUSIC SPIRIT

by Bill Cohen

“A raucous cacophony and lots of fun.” That’s how guitarist and singer Mike Zajano describes the Saturday morning jam he joins that shifts from the Worthington Green farmers’ market in warm weather to the indoor Worthington Mall in the winter months.

Sometimes it’s just a handful of musicians. Other times, the jam grows to a full dozen or more. “Everyone gets into the spirit of the music,” notes jammer Steven Ing. “When we pass the microphone around the circle and everyone gets a chance to present a song, it’s the closest thing -- coming from this inveterate Trekkie fan – to a group ‘Vulcan mind-meld.’”

The jammers bring tambourines, rhythm sticks, and drums. Shoppers are delighted to see their children pick up the instruments and keep the beat. “The kids bang along but we love it because they are participating,” says flutist Linda McDonald. “We have seen the same families visit us for years! We have really seen the children grow up.”

Percussionist Tom Nagel agrees. “One young fellow has been coming regularly for several years, starting when he was 3 or 4 years old; I think he’s in middle school now. He loves the washboard trap set. Dan Clarke has gotten several of the kids interested in cigar box guitars, which he makes for them.”

Guitarist Karen Stephens also notices how the children react to the music. “I love it when one of the kids actually sings or plays with us. It’s all about passing on the music to another generation.”

Adult spectators often find themselves drawn into the familiar folk tunes the jammers do. Karen relates this story from just a few weeks ago:

“We were doing ‘Will the Circle Be Unbroken,’ and I noticed a woman wiping her eyes. The verse was the one about the ‘hearse come rolling for to carry my mother away,’ so I went over during the song, thinking she had just lost her mother. Turns out it was her grandmother who had recently passed, and they had sung this song at her funeral. I gave her a hug.”

The camaraderie among the musicians is another highlight of the Saturday Worthington jams. “I enjoy that with the arrival of a new combination of musicians, there is an ever-changing meld of songs, instruments, styles, and personalities each week,” says guitarist and singer Charlie Flowers. “And yet, over time, there is a comfortable repetition that each member comes to appreciate in the collective effort to accompany them.”

Improvising songs with that ever-changing group also hones the musicians’ skills, according to guitarist and singer Hugh Farthing. “To see someone you play with become a very good musician through their own efforts improving every week is a great thing.”

“Non-judgmental” is how singer and guitarist Dan Clarke describes the attitude among the musicians. He says it’s silly that “TV has made us think that we all must sound like Johnny Cash and play like Eric Clapton.” Instead, Dan says, the jammers simply accept everyone’s musical abilities and styles, using the diversity to learn from each other.

Another great thing is the feeling of community the jammers help to spark. “I get an ego boost – and boy, with my low self-esteem, I need it!” says singer and guitarist Terry Keller. “I also love the laughter and general pandemonium.”

Laughter, sometimes sparked by jokes and puns, are indeed another highlight. Washtub bass player

Charlie Hummel was one of the humorists until he recently retired from the group, citing the fact he's nearing 90 years old. Talk about commitment to a group. From his home in the small town of Orient in Southwest Franklin County, “it was a 55 mile round trip every Saturday morning for 12 years through downtown Columbus. (Ugh)”

Charlie's “interaction with the ladies,” has provided a lot of laughs for the jammers, according to fellow jammer Larry Staats. Larry recalls that Charlie often urged young female bystanders to come up and play his washtub bass, just so he could be close enough to playfully hug them.

Actually, it was Larry's wife, Jan, who brought the jammers to the Worthington Green nearly a decade ago before she died in 2011. Jan was in charge of the Worthington Farmers' Market and wanted lively music to spice things up, so Larry put out a call for jammers via the Columbus Folk Music Society.

The shoppers and kids who gather around the jammers often show their appreciation with a couple quarters or a dollar bill thrown into a collection jar. The small donations really add up to big bucks. In 2015, the jammers raised a total of about $700, donating it to the Columbus Folk Music Society. In 2016, the bonanza doubled to about $1400!

It's just another example of a win-win project. The jammers in Worthington spread the joy of folk music.

They love what they're doing. Their audiences leave with a smile. The CFMS is richer literally. And all of us are richer figuratively.

Seriously folks, post this on your frig!
